His biography is therefore not only an intimate confession of a famous intellectual who reveals to us his deep disappointment with the profession to which he dedicated his entire life, but also a precious testimony about our past.

UDC	94(497.5)1941/1945" * 94(497.524)"1942"
Anotation	In Horthy's Hungary, Međimurje was marked in 1942 by the war against the USSR and the implementation of the state program of rationalization of life. Both left great traces on the people of Međimurje, both those who fought on the front lines of the Eastern Front and the civilian population. Apart from a few serious Hungarian studies on war operations and heavy battles of various units on the Soviet Don River, such as Molnár and Szábo, Kemendy, Vida, Kozári and some others, there is no other published data on civilian life in Međimurje in 1942. This especially applies to the comprehensive program of rationalization of life in all of Horthy's Hungary, which began to be implemented very intensively in the first days of that year.

From hall to hall, the emphasis is on the legal and symbolic continuity of the kingdom, which allows us to follow the idea of statehood through the centuries, from the emergence of the Croatian state and national rulers in the early Middle Ages to the election of foreign dynasties in the coming periods. It manifests itself in various categories, which are not necessarily equally and simultaneously represented: people (GENS / POPULUS), religion (RELIGIO), language (LINGUA), set of customs (MOS MAIORUM / TRADITIO), nation (NATIO)

	This book sheds light on the phenomenon of the Spanish flu pandemic in the area of Pula and southern Istria at the end of World War I and in the immediate aftermath. Several of the author's previously published articles on the subject are gathered in one place. The lack of a large number of historical sources influenced the research to turn to the scarce existing sources that, in interweaving, depict the occurrence of the pandemic and the social issues related to its mortality. With the help of other sources and literature, the author also provides several new answers about this important medical-historical phenomenon that occurred at a time of turbulent political, social, economic and existential problems for the inhabitants of Pula.

The research on which this work is based is dedicated to generals and admirals who were born in the then Croatian territory (Kingdom of Croatia and Slavonia, Kingdom of Dalmatia and Rijeka and its surroundings) or were originally from that area, regardless of their national and religious affiliation, and who served in the ranks of generals and admirals in the period from 1 January 1804 to 31 December 1918, regardless of which European army they served in.

	Journalist and diplomat Hido Bišćević offers a provocative and worrying analysis of the world situation in the book Veliki slom (The Great Breakdown - The West, Russia and the World Without Order). Russian aggression against Ukraine and the unpredictable policy of the new American administration are shaking the foundations of the international order established after World War II, liberal democracy is in crisis and, as Bišćević says, "dictators are no longer afraid." Bišćević dedicated a significant part of the book to memories of Russia and Turkey, where he was the Croatian ambassador in the nineties, as well as Tajikistan, where he was the head of the European Union mission.

Anotation	The subject of this book is an analysis of the medical history of patients who stayed at the "Royal Land Institute for the Insane in Stenjevec" from the beginning of its operation in November 1879 until the mid-1940s. It is approached from the perspective and theoretical framework of historical pragmatics. Historical pragmatics in its broadest sense studies language use in the past, seeking to explore patterns of human behavior, their historical development and its general principles, that is, to describe and understand language use in communities in the past that are not available for direct observation, and to explain their development and changes from a diachronic perspective.

Anotation	Betinska brodogradnja by academician Goran Filipi is a fundamental work for understanding the rich maritime heritage and traditional shipbuilding in the Adriatic and Mediterranean context. Betina shipbuilding is a treasury of a craft and an entire culture that is today maintained by enthusiasts of this business, after having been one of the driving forces of our maritime tradition for centuries: not the epic one of oceanic voyages and sailing ships, but the other one, which conquered the Adriatic archipelago with seemingly modest gajeta and leuta.

Zima deals with processions, funerals and pilgrimages, but also protest walks, demonstrations and pogroms.

Anotation	The novel Jednoruki follows Ante Prujić, a war veteran who lives with one arm, torn between the past, the present, and his love for Radmila. As he tries to survive in a seaside town, he faces injustice, corruption, and his own demons — but also the hope of a new beginning. The story raises the question of how much of the wounds of war remain invisible, yet deeply imprinted in everyday life.

Anotation	What happens to the Goršin family in Zagreb one Saturday begins as a story about the sudden death of their husband, father and grandfather, which is more than enough to disrupt and rearrange family relationships. The continuation of this family drama was hardly something anyone could have expected, least of all its actors themselves, and after them, the readers. The family is in the most chaotic moment because after the death, the truths about the unhappy marriage and double life will come to light, as will the mother's confession, which makes all this chaos seem insoluble.

	The literature of painter Dimitrij Popović is a natural extension of his artistic expression, a medium in which he moves confidently and skillfully. In the book Art Between Idea and Ideology, the author explores engaged art and its possible abuses, art in the age of rapid information flow and social networks, questions the representation of the body in visual culture, and exposes the boundaries between the sacred and the profane.

Anotation	In her new book Portret glumice (Portrait of an Actress), Maja Strozzi, with equal courage and exceptional writing talent, has stepped into a completely new literary field. In Portrait of an Actress, the author, based on historical documents, family stories and photographs, but also her own imagination, reconstructs the private and professional life of her grandmother Marija Ružička Strozzi, a legend of Croatian acting from the late 19th and early 20th centuries, who delighted audiences on the stages of the old Upper Town Theatre, and then the Zagreb Croatian National Theatre, from its opening, for more than fifty years and embodied more than 600 dramatic characters.
